New and notable: Week of Nov. 10, 2003

A roundup of this week's new and notable products.

EyeToy puts you in the video game

A new gadget from Sony PlayStation 2 lets you star in your own video game. Connect the EyeToy camera to a Universal Serial Bus (USB) port on the front of a PlayStation unit, plug the console into a television, and pop in the included game disc. As you juggle flying saucers in "UFO Juggler," do headers in "Soccer Craze" and deliver punches in "Boxing Chump," your body movements appear as part of the game play on the TV screen. The disc features 12 mini-games for one to four players as well as 14 virtual playrooms, including a spooky house of mirrors and a creepy spider encounter. If you have an 8-megabyte PS2 memory card, you can also use the EyeToy to record and play video messages. The EyeToy costs $50.

Gadget burns CDs, plays DVDs, stores tunes and photos

The RoadStor could become a frequent traveler's favorite toy. Not only can this portable gadget function as a CD burner, a DVD player, an MP3 player and a digital photo viewer, but it also works with several computer platforms. Thanks to its built-in 6-in-1 flash memory card reader and a USB 2.0 port, it can download MP3s and burn CDs on its own or with the help of a PC or Macintosh. Want to watch a movie or look at photos? You can connect it to a television's jacks or to a computer's USB port. The RoadStor measures 1.4 inches-by-5.4 inches-by-8.2 inches with its detachable lithium ion battery pack. Cost: $250.

Plug-in device helps you surf on the sly

Want to visit a Web site, but don't want your boss or nosy roommate to find out? Whether it's an employment site or an apartment finder, the StealthSurfer can keep your online pursuits private. Simply plug the device, which has its own browser, into a USB port on a PC and all your Internet files and Web based e-mail will be stored on the unit and not on your hard drive. And because the device can only be accessed with a password, there's no need to lock it in your desk when you're done. Prices range from $49.95 for a 64-megabyte device to $129.95 for a 256-megabyte model.

E-mail software built around search capabilities

Even the most cluttered e-mail inboxes can become useful again with a little help from Bloomba, a software program that can quickly locate important messages or information within them. Its search engine can locate messages containing key words in addresses, subject headings, message text and attachments. The Stata Labs program costs $59.95 and includes the spam-fighting SAproxy Pro 2.0 program.
