Device provides no trace of Web surfing

CAMARILLO, Calif., Oct. 8 (UPI) -- A new device that plugs into the computer keeps online activity away from employers or other prying eyes and ensures online privacy.

The device by The Avita Group of Camarillo, Calif., is a keychain-sized storage drive that plugs into the USB port of a computer.

Using a customized Web version of Netscape, the browser comes preloaded on the StealthSurfer drive and retains all cached files and other downloaded images privately on the removable device, ABC reported.

Once the user is done, the StealthSurfer is removed and all evidence of Internet activity is gone -- ensuring complete privacy of Internet habits, the company said in a statement.

So-called cookies, copies of Web pages, images, e-mails, and Web site passwords are all stored on the device itself and no trace is left on the computer's hard drive.

Once data is on the device, users can share the data by plugging the device into another computer.
